Course description

Children and youngsters naturally enjoy games and cooperative activities and learn more with them. When they face big obstacles, however, they struggle more than adults in finding balance and harmony and can revert more easily to individualism.

Can we teach them the power of cooperation, instead, and have them learn to solve complex issues and develop critical thinking by working as a team? This is quite important: it is the basis for democracy and active participation!

The course will explain a variety of group-work techniques – such as collaborative writing, classroom assembly, and group investigations – to make students learn to debate and collaborate in making research and sorting out complex problems.

These techniques have their roots in the inspirational work of many contemporary pedagogy authors: Lorenzo Milani, Célestin Freinet, John Dewey, and Yael Sharan. Thus, the course also represents an introduction to debate and social thinking grounded in the masterworks of the educational studies founders.

Participants will discover the techniques proposed for group work and discuss their potentialities and limits. The course will also give so much space for participants to develop their creativity, get inspired by others' input, and elaborate activities and solutions for their classroom.

By the end of the course, participants will design new activities ready for use once back home and be able to adapt the methodologies explored to their work context.

They will be deeply inspired by the efficacy of cooperative education and feel ready to make their students closer to democracy by having them collaborate with their peers.

Learning outcomes

The course will help the participants to:

- Identify the core features of participation and cooperation;
- Support collaboration and dialogue among students with cooperative tools based on democracy;
- Learn different strategies and techniques of group work inspired by the founders of contemporary pedagogy;
- Facilitate their students in the making choices process through collaborative writing and classroom assembly;
- Develop their active listening skills for increasing positive communication;
- Exercise their creativity in order to create new tools for their work;
- Find motivation by engaging in active reflection and group games with other educators and teachers.

Tentative schedule
